FIFTH CONGRESS—2ND SESSION.

IN SENATE.

EMBARGO DEBATE—CONTINUED.

NOVEMBER 28.

Mr. Adams then spoke.

The next article I shall mention is, the article of timber or lumber. I mention these articles particularly, in relation to the supply of the West Indies, because the other articles of lumber have been imported in large quantities, and the prohibition of the exports from those islands particularly embargoes and measures. And I am at a loss to know from whence these articles can be supplied, except from the U. S. It should also be remembered that timber and lumber are not of annual growth, they are parts of the vegetable world, and therefore that their deficiency cannot be so easily supplied as any other articles in commerce.

The next article I shall mention is tobacco—What says the Intendant of Martinique (speaking of this article)

"During the last month (October) the experienced some decrease, and a little has been made at prices under those quoted; but some considerable hoarding appears to be in export the market has again settled at these rates, and if any opening to the continent should be given, the medium of Holland, should be found, an advance may be expected; on the contrary if the usual duty and consumption to depend upon British trade, can take place shall the measures of the American government be known at the meeting of Congress in November next."

It is admitted that tobacco is not an article of the first necessity, it is however an article of the greatest interest, and highly important to the revenue.

Naval stores are also certainly entitled to some consideration, although very inferior to other articles, is now furnished from Sweden.

I have selected these articles as specimens of the immediate and distance of the commercial connection between the U. S. and G. Britain; the articles, Indigo, Rice, and Tobacco, which are on our part without exceptionably supplying her interests. Again, I will observe that will these articles interest to have open the revenue of the country? I think they are of more consequence, but if not certainly have sufficient which cannot be dispensed, and in the present state of the collected that C. Britain has imposed an export duty of 5 per cent upon Tobacco, and 2 per cent upon Indigo, which is equivalent to a duty of 7 per cent, or nearly three of the duties taken, on an equal revenue of a foreign article, actually produced and that the U. S. discriminating duty against the U. S. which ought to have been equal to the duties on the U. S. and especially, as it was avowed, that it was enforced upon the U. S. with the view of giving the British colonies an footing with the British colonies.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Lloyd) tells us, upon supposition that our correspondence with the U. S. consist of more manufactures than those employed in G. Britain, I will not be surprised if the U. S. may attach, it would only give her the thousand and one of others, more and more, and so on. This, sir, is an invasion specimen of the prosperity, which G. Britain is supposed to have enjoyed, in the contest, Mr. Lloyd, I am really informed, gradually, and positively, prohibiting the exports of the U. S. to New York, Mr. Madison, Tobacco materials (which the manufactures of Great Britain, and the Colonies they would make poor in them, is very uniform. I do not think the Colonies will have much to be for their property. They are fit for manufactures, and manufacture, the children from their habitual employments, they have stores, or become a change, and a change, and so on. But the connection of fifty thousand produce, into fifty thousand manufactures, and more expensive labor, would not contribute much to the wealth or power of any nation; and I am convinced, Mr. Lloyd, when the power says so sufficiently high already, would contribute the nation attention of the government.

There is another circumstance to be taken, of a nature, of a nature, the number of seamen and soldiers. It is necessary—it is necessary—to be radius upon labor, could not be more effective of revenue, but would be an insuperable objection. I am therefore inclined to think that the British colonist would not feel any great difficulty in the operation of his Bigotry obscurity. All these considerations must present strong objections to Great Britain to revoke her hostile orders; but one has achieve revoked to the U. S.

Let a candid enquiry be now made into the actual causes of this refusal. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Lloyd) informs us that the British colonies are well conciliated to the British colonies, and will some time between the 22nd June and the 29th of July, when the British colonies information flowed in upon them, which tottered them from this solicitude, and consequently, the 29th of July, Mr. Lloyd tries to explain. He told us further in the month of July and July, without mentioning any particular days of those months? I think that the gentleman ought to mention the particular days; I think the particular days for greater precision, and the correspondence between Mr. Pinkney and Mr. Madison, from which I procured the preliminary drawn from the Colonies.

What was the information that flowed in upon the British colonies, the 22d June, or the 29th of July, that produced announcement of the British colonies? Spain, although this event must have been pretty well understood in London before the 22d June, the news appears not to its full extent. The other event was, the paltry attempt at the revocation of the embargo laws, in November, magnified into a formidable opposition to the government; and the unhappy discontents manifested in Boston and its neighborhood, the Gazettes of the 29th of the elections in Massachusetts. All these circumstances were certainly known in London, or, perhaps, sufficiently misrepresented. Here, then, sir, we plainly discover the cause of the refusal of the British cabinet to meet the just and honorable proposition of the embargo laws. In
