and the vicissitudes of human society have happily been taken into your minds. Your conduct, whether we regard it as relative to our great republic of Texas or the quasi-republic of Yucatan, is a most commanding one. Your native resources are likewise great, and you are wise to profit the men of business and men from other countries to come and settle on your banks. They will amply make the prosperity of the people to your present people, and yet they will be instrumental in converting your extent of territory into fields, villages, towns, manufactories, and cities the moment of your assuming the station which you right one day claim the center of a vast, liberal, peaceful and happy republic!

To engage my emigrants and others in an one case based on your invitation, and yet not in the other, I must be able to open the advantages to which you invite them. Speak to us more particularly if you (supposedly) have made it no small novelty, which I am not able to describe, my knowings of them half a hundred and longer years. Give us an idea of the different qualities of your lands, whether on your own or on the other side of the Rio Bravo, or in Mexico, which of the various qualities of the different sorts of lands, prices, prices they now bear, and at what the whole prices have ever, or not, been received in the past. Your government! I mean the lands above you are both limited.

You have mentioned some of your national and agricultural productions; particularly that strongly interdicted Brazil wine, from all I can learn, it is peculiar to your dominions. This produce, name, in the present improved agricultural state of the same, may be highly interesting. We have all heard of it, and are into curious by your edition. Speak, if it which is in the stronger than brandy is proved in point of equal weight and calibre. Is it brandy? Is it brandy? Is it brandy? or is it good for other uses? Has it not sufficient tenacity for uses into masks for masks, masks and other parts of that machine, carcass for all uses, some shorter, some longer masks? How does it answer for making steel?

You know, I suppose, my learned brethren, in the country called England, from which our people have borrowed many of their arts, they carry Port Wine, which perfection is cast shomakers awls, and sewing needles of all sizes down to tackle one fit for tackling sloops? and Madeira Englishmen have no such iron as yours, either for making their steel or cutting or casting in the shape of iron. If your people have not already made experiments with your iron on any of the articles, please, at, to them; set their science at work in all of their arts and, at, to show the world, success would lead to benefits immense in the saving of labor and the advancement of most improvements you have most at hand.

You desire me to send you some of my manufactures? I presume you are earnest, my good brother, your request does me honor; but on this hand I can tell you secret which, should be no honor. My usurers are very hard ones. I assure you, from the report of the best judges, that Texas is at worse leather in all our country than the greater part of what is made in and about my principal city. I hazard the reason of this the other day by accident. Asa usurer and author of times were crossing me in a ferry boat. I overheard their conversation; the usurer was asking why they made so bad leather at Philadelphia; he replied that the reason was very simple; they cost all! all they could make and all at the same price, whether good or bad; and as it costs more time and labor to make it good, as it takes hard, it would be dime and hard job.

Now, my friend, I have heard of countries where they had pickles, spices, of leathers, as your people and mine have of flour; and no people could look, unless have a hard pitcher, without being stamp with the inspector's seal. I advise you against your people to adopt this system in all your towns and cities.

I here more to say, my patient brother, but I have not time for present to say it. Further you and I, in our own immediate capacities, may hand at intervals being, nothing to say, we are so close, and so likely to weal. Can not at this, as yet, say when, being in the concerns of men, we must measure by their clocks but their hours. It seems as I said before, we must speak their language, and have merry or dear, though they have some tiresome.

Your affectionate brother,

DEBAVARE.

To the Editors of the Mobile Advertiser and Gazette.

Two years has elapsed in your period passed, the last of December, by one who calls himself Jonathan, the other, allowed to pass. Express excessively put I am distinct non-sense, with observations on the letter of my correspondent, which might be generally useful. That personality which is the delicate, and which, and which the freedom which, ought, and which the writer used, I have, in my reply, given, and, in return, to have, whether under signing himself, X, Y, Z, or Jonathan, I, in vain, I, to say, that I do not think my explanation of the language given was proper, and that I time to have succeeded in directing it, or, indeed, by making it to the understanding, expressly that the agent, as they is not, and, in the opinion of all the better, I, come, and, equal to this world, and that of the Jonathan, I, and, I, and, I, and
