

Germany's adoption of the weapons of modern science forced her enemies to return in kind. Here the French from one of their front line trenches are turning on the Kaiser's troops that terrible liquid gas which they were the first to use. © Kadel & Herbert.

No, this is not an observatory photograph of the deserts of the moon. It's a scene on the Somme front showing poilus reinforcing their comrades in the trenches. German shells have pock-marked the entire barren landscape. © Underwood & Underwood.

The French are using this ingenious machine, much like the ancient cross-bow, to hurl newspapers containing President Wilson's speeches and news of allied victories into the German trenches. Doubtless Fritz finds them interesting. © Kadel & Herbert.

Smoke screens now play an important part in sea fights, as the camouflage does on land. The British destroyers in this noble sea picture are just starting the screen that hides them from enemy gunners. © Central News.

