French soldiers firing from the upper windows of a ruined cottage during a counter attack. Fighting through the streets of such little villages has been of the most stubborn kind, as possession of these points offers a decided advantage. Kadel & Herbert.

Before a British shell struck it this was a windmill, converted into a strong observation post by the Germans. Huge blocks of concrete reinforced the base, but one shell was quite enough to put observer and post completely out of commission. Everywhere along the Western Front is to be seen just such evidence of the terrific destruction of heavy artillery fire. Underwood.

The picturesque headquarters of General Petitti in Macedonia. This is the character of the country, dormant for centuries and ruled over by the Albanian guerillas, whose power is used by the Allies in dealing with the restless population. Gilliams Service.

The stubborn fighting which took place before the Austrians surrendered this big gun to the Italians is indicated by the torn up condition of the ground. The Austro-German advance has been stopped by recent terrific battles. Gilliams Service.

This photograph, taken in the rain, shows the kind of front line trench the French have been fighting from in some sectors. "Trench feet" in the early days of the war put thousands out of action. Kadel & Herbert
