

British Sailors after the North Sea Battle—Exclusive photograph showing some of the sea fighters on the deck of a hospital ship just before their transfer to land.

Especially Recommended to the Attention of Camps Plattsburg, Whitman and Seagirt.

Taking North Sea Fighters to a Hospital Ship. The wounded British sailors were transferred from their ships after the battle to "drifters" which in turn took them to hospital ships.

War and Worship Underground. Religious services are held in the French trenches, sometimes while they are being bombarded. The photograph shows an underground chapel in Verdun sector.

Lieutenant Immelman, the German air fighter reported killed. He was recently decorated by the Emperor after finishing thirteen enemy battleplanes.

First in War as Well as Peace—Woman. French and Belgian women in Paris have organized a regiment for any service demanded of them. They are here seen parading in uniforms fit for trench or hospital.

The Loyal North Lancashires Help Hold the British Line. This regiment, following the explosion of a mine by the Germans, leaped from their trenches and captured 360 yards of enemy positions in an hour.