

A safety razor, made in Germany, was a talisman for a British non-commissioned officer who was later killed in battle.

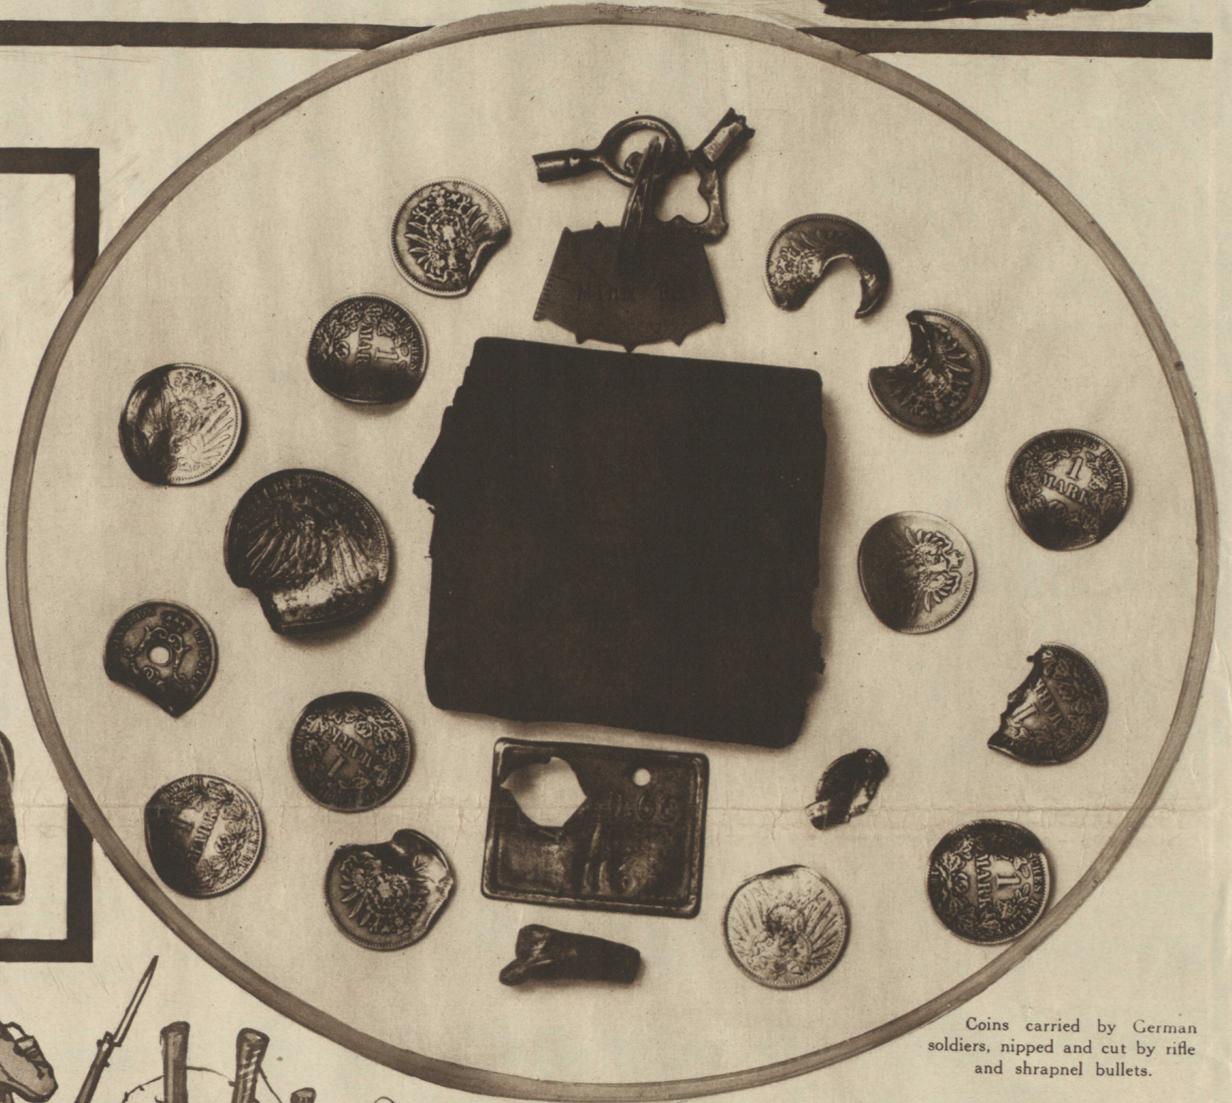

The Fraction Of an Inch That Sometimes Means Life Instead Of Death in War.
Photos from Underwood & Underwood.

A Bible carried in a breast pocket saved the life of a German soldier. The bullet destined for his heart is imbedded in its leaves.

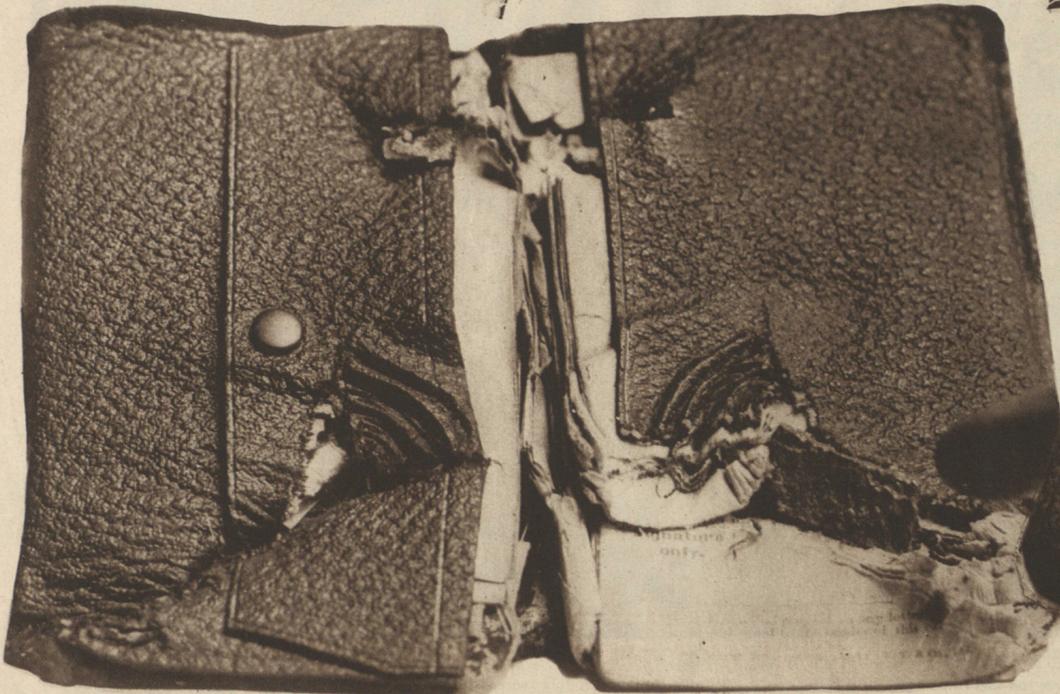

A clip of British cartridges transfixed by a German bullet in a soldier's bandolier.

Coins carried by German soldiers, nipped and cut by rifle and shrapnel bullets.

A cheap watch, but a good one. So it proved, at any rate, for the Tommy who wore it in battle.

This pocket-book was hit twice in an engagement—once by a bullet, again by shrapnel.

The captain and comrades of the Britisher whose life was saved by this cigarette case were killed in the action in which he escaped.