

The Anniversary, August, 1915. Bernhardt: "Have we not surpassed your sanguine expectations?"

William: "Don't miss the right moment, 'Tino.'" ["'Tino' is the Greek King, Constantine.]

"Ain't I a lovable fellow?"

What shall we do without Michael? Michael: "For my 100 marks I have obtained a receipt. I gave this for a second 100 marks and I received a second receipt. For the third loan I gave the second receipt. Have I invested 300 marks and has the government got 300, or have both of us got nothing?" Michael is a familiar German nickname for a simple, honest peasant.

He Is Still Drawing Them. Two Hundred of His Originals Are on Exhibition Here, to Be Sold for the Red Cross. Photos by Social Press Association.

Letters from the front: "A winter campaign seems inevitable."

Sympathy. "If I find you again looking so sad, I'll send you to Germany after your father."

Supposed Secret Agents Have Tried Nine Times to Kill Louis Raemaekers, a Dutchman, for His Cartoons on the War.